INTERNATIONAL YEAR FOR THE WORLD'S INDIGENOUS PEOPLES

How time flies? Thirty years ago (10 December 1992) a speech was given in Redfern to launch the International Year for the World's Indigenous Peoples. In that speech many issues were raised that we still grapple with in 2023. In truth, have we really as a nation, succeeded in extending opportunity and care, dignity and hope to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Island people? Our identity cannot be separated from Aboriginal Australia.

This year (2023) is the time to bring the dispossessed out of the shadows, to recognise that they are part of us and that we cannot give Indigenous Australians up without giving up many of our own most deeply held values, much of our own identity and humanity. Surely we can find just solutions to the problems which beset the first Australians - the people to whom the most injustice has been done. This must begin with the act of Recognition.

In coming months we should ignore the outbreaks of hysteria, hostility and politics. The message should be that there is nothing to fear or to lose in recognition, in historical truth, or the extension of social justice or the deepening of Australian social democracy to include Indigenous Australians. Where Aboriginal Australians have been included in the life of Australia remarkable contributions have been made. If we have a sense of justice and common sense, we will forge a new partnership.

We are beginning to appreciate the depth and diversity of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultures. From music, art and dance we are beginning to recognise how much richer our national life and identity is for their participation. We are beginning to learn how we should live with our physical environment. We are beginning to recognise the wisdom contained in their epic story.

The issues raised above come from a speech given by then Prime Minister Paul Keating, 10 December 1992. Many other points were raised in this speech and are still relevant in discussion around the Voice today. Why are we so slow to respond to common sense?
